Dear Arthur,

Your letter of the 22nd inst, has indeed reached me here in our usual mountain resort from where I rather expect to go directly to England some time about the middle of September.

I believe there is only one addition that could be made at the end of the Tiger by the Tail, the article, or perhaps two articles, I wrote in early October (?) 1974 for the Daily Telegraph. Until then I had been since 1970 practically out of action for health reasons. And all that I have published since on these sort of topics has appeared in your publications. I am however particularly anxious that the three much earlier articles to which I gave you references (and one Xerox copy) earlier this year should go in. They show much better than anything Soudha Shenoy found (or could easily have found) how early and how much I predicted the developments.

I should very much wish that copies of the second edition of Denationalisation of Money should be available at New Orleans when I am going to speak on the topic before the same audience to whom I sketched the idea first at Lausanne two years earlier. I shall of course want to see proofs and have a number of sentences and perhaps a few footnotes to insert.

I was a little disappointed by the small response to my letter to The Times but I have just sent them a second in response to the rather silly one of Peter Wallington (who is he?) and who is Ronald Butt whose essays in The Times I have seen with pleasure for some time.

Just when I hoped I had reached the point when I could publish my two talks as "written in the main hope that the BBC would allow me to broadcast them" they have offered to record them when I am next in England, which would mean September. I am afraid I am now caught because there is nothing to prevent them to delay indefinitely afterwards or to put them on some program little noticed.

When on my brief return to Freiburg three weeks ago I found the ~~xxxxxxx~~ last letter from The Economist I decided to write once more and enclose a carbon. So far I have had no further reply.

An abridged version of a lecture on the Denationalisation of Money which I gave at Stanford will shortly appear in the Wall Street Journal. I plan to publish the full text elsewhere.

Best regards,
