The opinions of British TV and Radio are not generally subjected to the kind of scrutiny which is given to the words of William Shakespeare, but I would like you to consider the a programme which went out on the BBC World Service on 14th July 1979.

A distinguished correspondent has made a protest about the balance of this programme. First, I would be grateful if yeceive your views on how we should pursue a complaint, if indeed we should. It may be too late or unwise. Secondly, please let me know what system you mean to establish whereby complaints of this kind can be fed through to the relevant people in the broadcasting services. I believe that we will be receiving several protests from people from every walk of life during the next few years and we might just as well be clear about what our system is before the avalance descends.
