Chancellor Kohl

Sir Julian Bullard, in commenting on President von Weizscker's State Visit, has said he sees a risk that Chancellor Kohl, who judges most things by the test of political advantage, may feel his own nose slightly out of joint as a result of the President's success in Britain. With this in mind the Ambassador aims to see Kohl again before the summer break to reassure him that we are in no danger of forgetting where power resides in the Federal Republic, and to show we are aware that the wave of goodwill which von Weizsäcker was able to ride is in no small degree the result of German achievements in the $3\frac{1}{2}$ years since Kohl became Chancellor.

Sir Julian Bullard thought that the Prime Minister might want to convey thoughts on these lines in a message to Kohl which he could deliver. Sir Geoffrey Howe thinks that this suggestion has much to commend it but that it would be best for the Ambassador to speak in the Prime Minister's name. I enclose a draft telegram.

Yours every Colin Budd
